A NOTE FROM THE ARTISTIC DIRECTOR

If you are reading this...that means we are performing High School Musical! This was not a sure thing. I know we always say "the show must go on," but I think we've all learned that that adage is no match for a worldwide pandemic. On the road to get HSM to the stage, in front of an audience, we've faced every challenge, save locusts, it seems. Just when we thought we were in the clear, that we had survived or made adjustments for all of the issues COVID could throw our way, Snowpocalypse '21 hit and we had to cancel all of our technical rehearsals and the opening of the show.

But here we are and our new adage is...celebrate every victory! Celebrate the resilience of young artists, both on stage and on the production team, who refuse to let obstacles stand in the way of self expression. Celebrate that we are here in a room together with these talented performers, telling a story about being true to ourselves while also being accepting of each others' differences. Celebrate that the kids telling the story exemplify the message in the story, that we are literally "All In This Together," which they have demonstrated over and over in their actions toward each other through a creative process that was equal parts unrelenting struggle and unabashed joy.

I have worked with over a hundred youth theatre casts, in various roles, throughout my career. Each one is unique, but this is an ensemble I will never forget. This cast didn't simply "act like they wanted to be here." With each new obstacle, the adults would turn to each other and ask how these kids could still seem so dang happy? They oozed positivity through every twist and turn, and they kept their production team inspired even when we were wondering if we could actually go forward.

I find youth theatre to be miraculous in general, but this production is a little extra. Whichever performance you see, you will be watching them create magic before your very eyes. While most casts are a consistent group of people who rehearse and perform together over and over, this cast has fluctuated in size and shape on a daily basis. In each performance, someone will be performing a role that they were never expecting to perform, which they may have taken on last month, or last night.

We have watched this ensemble adjust, and readjust, and then adjust again, to deal with whatever next challenge is presented. So watch them work their magic, while singing, dancing and acting at the same time, and then, celebrate!
